Why Does the Copyright Office Need the Information Requested in This Addendum?

Works published prior to January 1, 1978, were subject to the 1909 copyright law. This law was stricter than the law currently in effect. Certain formalities had to be met in order for a work of authorship to secure copyright protection. The use of a copyright notice in a prescribed form and location was required. For most works, the notice had to include the word “Copyright,” its abbreviation “Copr.,” or the symbol “©;” the name of the copyright owner; and the date of first publication. Eligibility had to be established for both published and unpublished works based on the citizenship or domicile of the author(s) or the nation where the work was first published. Certain literary and artistic works had to be manufactured in the United States in order to qualify for full-term copyright protection in this country. The information appearing in this form will determine whether the work is currently under copyright protection in the United States. If the work is in the public domain in this country, having failed to meet one or more of the preceding requirements, renewal registration will be denied.
